Abstract: I present the emotional perception model of moral judgment. On this model, moral judgments are beliefs about objective properties of the things we judge. Our feelings about those things cause our beliefs, much as our sensory experiences cause beliefs about things in the outside world. The beliefs are accompanied by motivational force because the emotions contain desires. This model follows Hume and Nietzsche in treating moral motivation as basically desire-driven, and is supported by recent psychological research.